"I don't believe in colleges and universities. I believe in libraries because most students don't have any money. When I graduated from high school, it was during the Depression and we had no money. I couldn't go to college, so I went to the library three days a week for 10 years."

~ Ray Bradbury

A Message From the Board

Almost since the turn of the century, it seems, we've been hearing about the demise of libraries. The rise of the Internet, digital texts, and other paperless systems, libraries and book-lovers have been told, would result in some sort of existential crisis for those devoted to securing the public with quality, accessible and information, knowledge, entertainment, and space. As the MIT Technology Review put it in one headline from 2005, "Digitization of print could reduce today's libraries to musty archives."

But then came 2012.

For a variety of reasons, 2012 saw a remarkable number of highly publicized reports, studies, and news stories—by groups as varied as the Pew Research Center and the New York Times—that explored the future of public libraries in America. And to the surprise of many, time and again these studies and articles concluded that the reports on the death of libraries have been greatly exaggerated.

For example, according to a Pew Research Center study from 2012, 80% of Americans feel that borrowing paper books is a "very important" service libraries provide and want libraries to continue to do so in the new century—even as they adopt digital technologies. Traditional books aside, many observers feel that libraries continue to matter because of the less tangible services they provide the public—wireless connectivity, database access (think ancestry.com or newspaper clearinghouses), children's and adult learning programs, and collaborative gathering space. As one writer put it in The Atlantic recently, libraries "have just about everything a 21st century innovator could need: Internet access, work space, reference materials, professional guidance." It is for these reasons and more that, as the same article notes, although jobs in book, newspaper, and periodical publishing are down 38% since 2001, library employment has remained stable, and even grown in some communities.

In the spirit of such conclusions, this annual report notes the expansion of services and circulation at the Grand Forks Public Library in 2012. In short, 2012 marked the continued expansion of library programs and services in Grand Forks that began in 2009: GFPL loaned out more items last year, compared to 2011, and saw its attendance at children's programming reach record levels. The Library director and staff accomplished this growth, it should be noted, on a smaller budget and with less staff than that of many of their peer institutions both in the region and around the country.

Among our other achievements in 2012, we developed a 2012-2015 Strategic Plan and, as a top priority, brought in JLG Architects to assess and document facility needs and associated costs. As a result of these findings, a 20-member Library Working Group consisting of representatives of a wide range of community members was pulled together to begin discussing what the community wants and needs for its library of the future.

In addition, the Library began offering e-mail notifications of hold requests and overdue items, online library card registration and feedback options, increased personal service to library visitors, and continued collaboration with numerous community organizations.

We are proud of each of these accomplishments and are excited every day to be part of a community that puts such a high value on its library.

For all these reasons and more, 2012 was a remarkable year for the Grand Forks Public Library; as such, the Library Board would like to thank not only Library Director Wendy Wendt for her exceptional leadership, but each and every member of the dedicated GFPL staff, without whom such energy and growth would be impossible. Here's to a strong 2013.

The Difference We Make

Stories from our Staff:

"Four years ago a young man came in with his 2 year old son. The son was rather wild in the library and a very fast runner. The little guy had ways off ensuring that DVD's and books were returned in damaged condition. We worked with the father and son until items were returned in good shape for quite a few months. The son is much calmer now, and the father credits regular trips to the library and reading books together as the reason why his son is more focused. The little guy used to take a run at me and yell 'Scooby Dooby Doo!' when he came into the library."

"One day a man wanted repair information for a Volkswagen. We didn't have a book he could check out, but when I demonstrated the auto repair center database for him, he was thrilled. He was also pleased to learn that he could access it from home."

"A few years ago a man who was quite active and prominent in the Grand Forks community had a very debilitating stroke. He was left bedridden and with very little ability to speak. His wife came to the library and asked for help with something to entertain both of them while she sat with him in his room every day at the care facility. They were both used to having busy lives and now there was a dramatic change. She found books on tape and CD were the perfect answer. She came in once or twice a week for several years until he passed away."

"A gentleman from Seattle, WA was looking for any information about his great grandparents and grandmother. They lived in this area from 1880-1905. He wanted information about the towns they lived in and also the Catholic churches in the same area. I found him some information and directed him to other sources that might have additional information. He made photocopies of early pictures and other articles. He was very appreciative. He had to shake my hand and thank me many times for the information."

"An original idea. That can't be too hard. A library must be full of them."
~ Stephen Fry

"I received the fundamentals of my education in school, but that was not enough. My real education, the superstructure, the details, the true architecture, I got out of the public library. For an impoverished child whose family could not afford to buy books, the library was the open door to wonder and achievement, and I can never be sufficiently grateful that I had the wit to charge through that door and make the most of it."
~ Isaac Asimov

“Whatever the cost of our libraries, the price is cheap compared to that of an ignorant nation.”
~ Walter Cronkite
